Introduction

The term “Coach” originated in the sports field in the late 1880s. W. Timothy Gallwey wrote in his seminal book in 1972 entitled “The Inner Game of Tennis” that it is harder to defeat the opponent within than the one outside. This was the first major transition from sports coaching to personal coaching.

A life coach helps clients attain their goal in life while motivating them to achieve their personal objectives such as choosing or changing careers and improving relationships. A life coach encourages self-discovery by holding the person responsible and accountable for his choices and behaviors.

Life coaching is a process that helps people dramatically improve their vision on work and life while unlocking their potential by providing them guidance and personal empowerment.

Coaching is different than therapy. Therapy provides treatment plans that heal pain and often focuses on resolving difficulties arising from the past, whereas life coaching:

- Trains clients to be aware of life patterns that do not serve their purpose
- Focuses on shifting thinking that creates more effective actions and patterns
- Orients clients towards more positive and future solutions rather than past and negative drawbacks

In addition, a client will have the necessary tools to deal with and minimize every day stress.
